Not all IP solutions can be found by traditional legislation and soft law. Big business has sought to take matters in its own hands through IP self-regulation, whereby those wishing to engage in economic activity must abide by certain IP rules and regulations. As voluntary co-operation agreements start to be signed, IP liability regimes shift. Sometimes this self-regulation may even influence legislation and result in sui generis systems of dispute resolution and enforcement. Panellists will outline those rules and co-operation agreements from an IP perspective, while looking at how they are being currently implemented by commerce and sometimes lawmakers, and what improvements are possible.
